Market Overview

Global sharemarkets recorded a strong 12-month period to 31 March 2022, although geopolitical events (primarily Russia's invasion of Ukraine) in early 2022 took some of the gloss off returns for investors.

The United States market led global markets forward for the period, while most other markets around the world also recorded healthy gains in 2021 but took a back seat to the headline grabbing rally in the United States. Emerging markets experienced a different story to the larger economies, with these countries experiencing widely different returns. Closer to home the New Zealand sharemarket trended lower as interest rates rose, eventually finishing in negative territory over the 12-months to 31 March 2022.

Through this period, time and again investors around the world brushed off bad news including high inflation levels and supply chain disruptions. None of these events stopped sharemarkets from notching all-time highs over the year, not even the Delta or Omicron COVID-19 variants. These events turned out to be short-term market dips; periods of buying opportunities supported by positive company earnings in what was a stellar 12-months for shares.

The positive sentiment experienced during most of the period ended suddenly in February 2022 as geopolitical developments came to the fore. Investor sentiment shifted and sharemarkets came under selling pressure as Russia invaded Ukraine. Governments from around the world condemned the invasion, imposing strict sanctions targeting Russia's banking system and oligarch elite. Since the invasion, sharemarkets around the world have remained volatile, trending lower.

Record levels of inflation, the removal of economic support packages and eventual interest rate rises saw bond yields rise over the period, while the New Zealand dollar trended lower. The interest rate rises around the globe resulted in negative returns for bonds in the early part of 2022.

Outlook

Looking ahead, while we are generally supportive of growth assets, the market outlook remains clouded; positive company earnings combined with geopolitical turmoil and the negatives of inflation and rising interest rates provide investors an abundance of information to grapple with.
